The departure from Washington was without incident. As the president alighted from his carriage at the side entrance to the train shed, he assisted Mrs. Roosevelt out and then smiled and raised his hat to the half hundred spectators who had gathered to see his departure. Just before the train moved out, the president stepped from the observation room to the rear platform of his car and smilingly bowed acknowledgment to the flutter have accomplished in the forty years of peace which followed. For forty years the south has made not merely a courageous, but at times a desperate struggle, as she has striven for moral and material well-being. Her success has been extraordinary, and all citizens of our common country should feel joy and pride in ft; for any great deed done, or any fine qualities shown, by one group of Americans, of necessity reflects credit upon all Americans. Only a heroic people could have battled successfully against the conditions with which the people of the south found themselves ace to face at the end of the civil war. There had been utter destruction and issuster, and wholly new business and ocial problems had to be faced with the cantilest means. The economic and potical fabric had to be readjusted in the sidest of dire want, of grinding poverty.
